

It turned out to be a walk.

Sometimes I go for a walk.

The thing that occurred to me is how things can be so different.

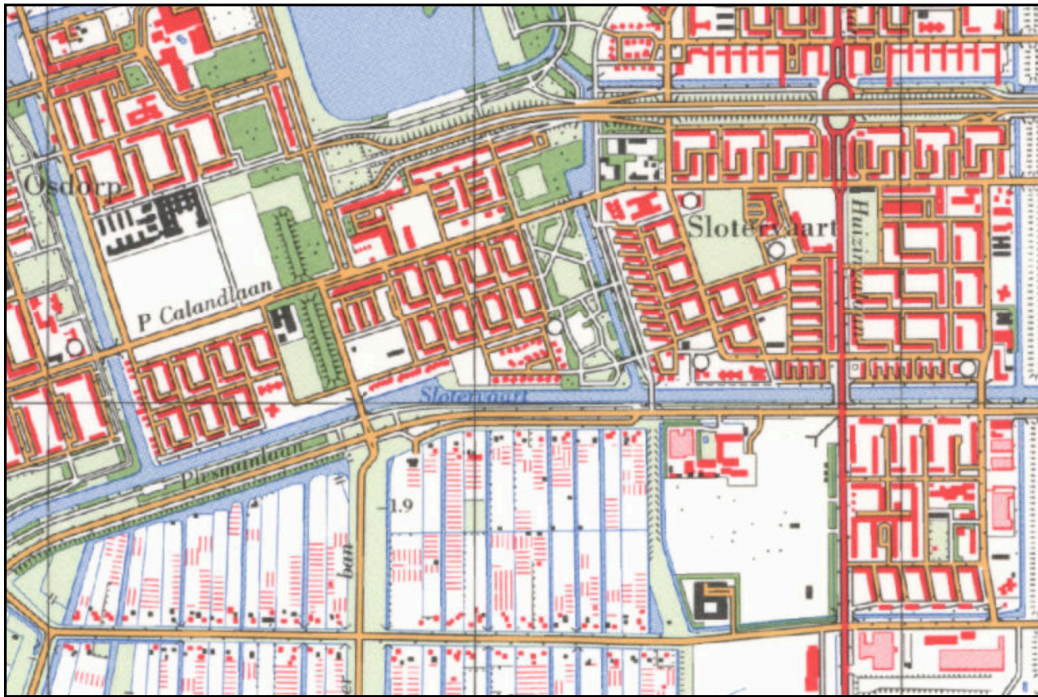

When I walk I see things in a different way than when I look on a map.

Colours seem to be more vibrant.

I almost forget how well thought through things are here.

Everything is at its place, so someone like me can experience it the way they want me to.

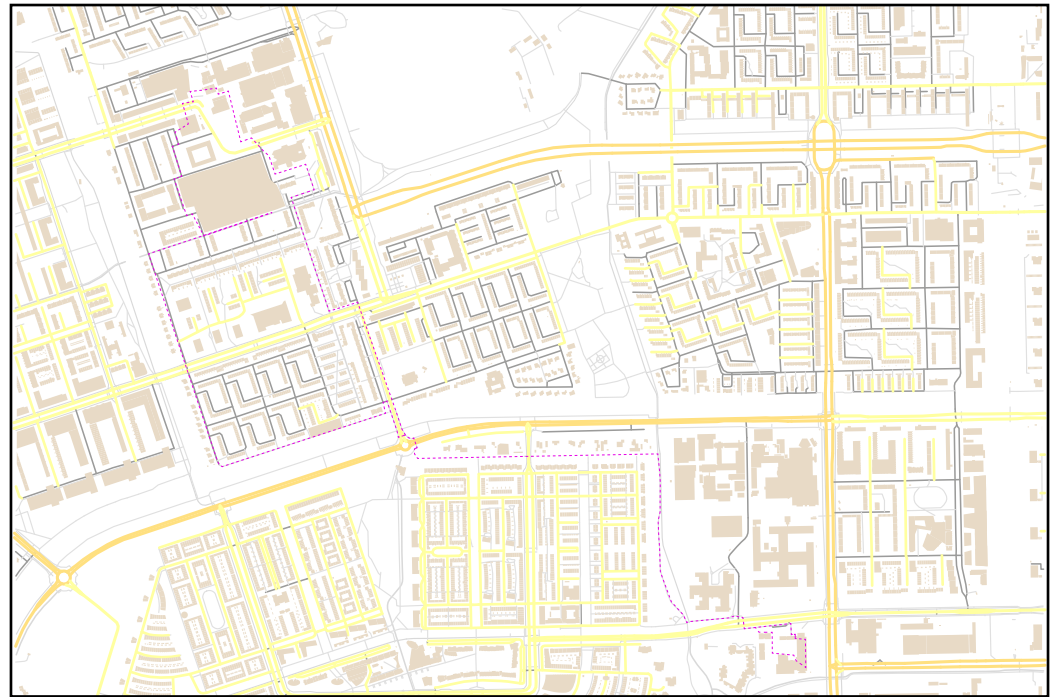

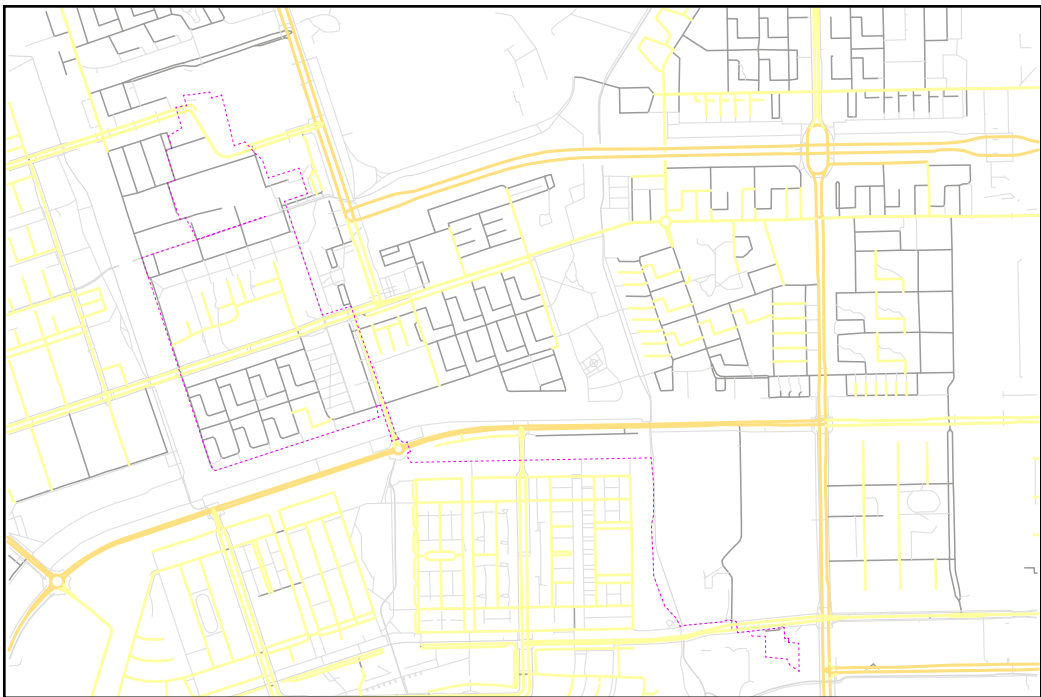

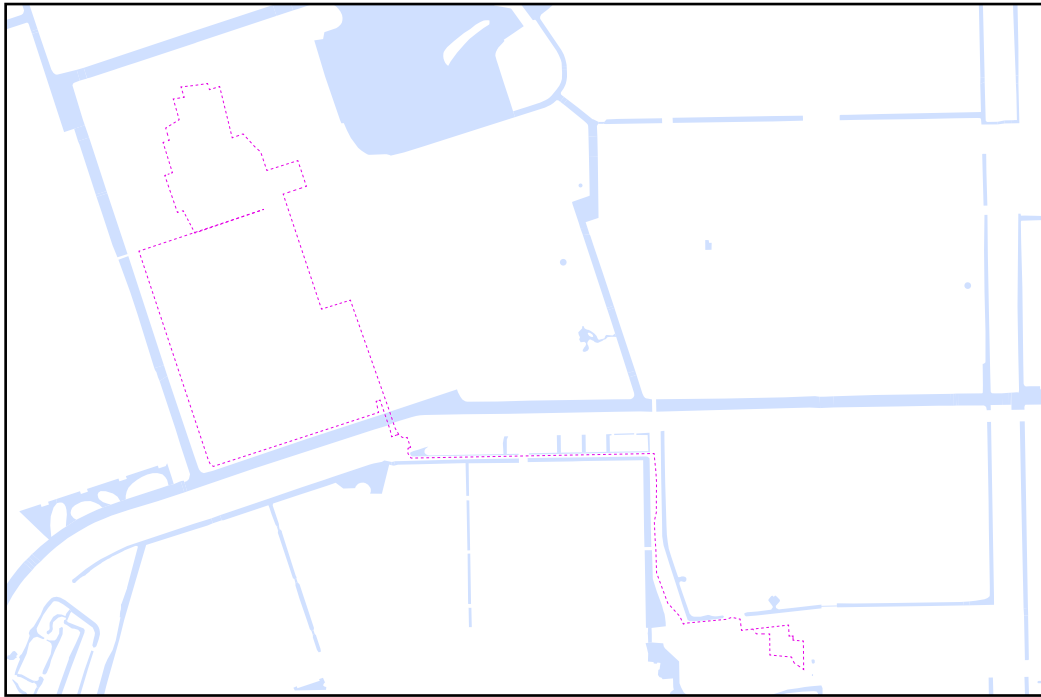

Everything is planned out for us
and all this knowledge is kept in the form of maps.
Historical maps,
Maps to measure noise pollution,
Maps to show which trees are to be replaced.
Almost everything we can imagine has been drawn out.

You can see how everything grew and developed together. Water was changed to polders and everything grew around this. However, the feeling of being there isn't the same as when you go for a walk.
